Excerpt: ... CHAPTER XXIV THE POLITICAL, FUTURE The story has now been told of the vicissitudes which Palestine and its peoples have undergone since its subjugation by the Romans. Conquest has followed conquest from that day almost to this. Roman, Byzantine, Frank, Saracen, Turk, have all held sway for long periods. For shorter ones other conquerors have had possession of the land. In all ages Palestine has been an object of desire and of contention. Ruler has succeeded to ruler, but seldom have the subjects benefited by the change. With the exception of the period of Frankish domination, Palestine has always been governed in the interests not of its own people, but of those of another land; and even under the Franks the interests of the indigenous populations were invariably made subservient to those of new-comers. The history of Palestine during the past eighteen centuries has been bounteous in incidents. In prosperity, however, it has shown an almost uninterrupted degeneration. The Romans found the country thickly inhabited by a population generally prosperous. The forthcoming congress for the settlement of the affairs of civilization will look upon it as almost a desert land inhabited by a sparse and on the whole poverty-stricken population. The purpose of this volume is not merely to give a history of the degeneration of Palestine. It looks toward the future as well as back to the past. It attempts to extract from the experience of history the lesson out of which profit may be obtained in the future. To a large extent it deals with the dry sticks of the dead, but it also finds and turns the light upon the green shoots of the living. The story of eighteen centuries of retrogression has been told, but in far greater detail has been described the revival which is no...
